In recent years many metal pots have reached the Ilongot through trade. However, some of the women are still excellent potters.

They knead the lay with their hands in order to remove gravel and lumps, and then shape the pots with their hands. A portion of a broken dish generally serves as a crude potters' wheel and is turned with the hands. The final shaping is done with wooden paddles in which designs have been cut. When these are pressed against the damp clay they leave a decorative imprint. The pots are then fired and are ready for use.
